Wilshire --

This week in Public Safety Committee, Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) Chief Charlie Beck provided us with a report on the state of our police force and the spike in crime over the past year. Chief Beck reported that the department must hire 2,500 additional officers in the coming years to better protect the city and keep crime down. The current size of the ranks is about 10,000 officers.

During the committee meeting, I hammered on the issue about not enough LAPD officers being street ready. The industry standard for street ready officers is 90 percent. Only about 82 percent of our LAPD officers are street ready - in other words, about 18 percent of officers are working desk jobs, or taking leaves of absence because of injuries. This translates into approximately 1860 officers being unable to perform duties out on the street.

The City has a slow process of getting officers back on the job, which is hindering the way we protect our communities. On top of this, our ability to hire more officers is made even more complicated by a time consuming and expensive process, and one that does not happen overnight.

The immediate fix: we need to revise our policies to get more officers on the streets, and get civilians hired, so active duty officers can get out from behind the desk and out on patrol.

Public safety is my number one priority in office, and I will continue to identify ways we can place more officers on the streets to keep our communities safer.

Speaking of keeping our communities safer, expect an announcement this coming week related to Hollywood! As you'll read in the updates below, together we are working to improve the quality of life across every section of the 13th District.

Regards,

Mitch O'Farrell
